1. On 10 December 1954, Jan Dobraczynski, a well-known Catholic writer from Warsaw, arrived in East Berlin as guest of the GDR government. In East Berlin, the Pole repeatedly visited the headquarters of the newspaper of one of the so-called bourgeois parties. He was interested in being furnished with material related to the Karlsruhe trial of the KPD. When the editor-in-chief of the newspaper involved inquired at the GDR press bureau if he could communicate to the Polish writer the material made available by the press bureau he was told that the Soviet Embassy in Berlin had forbidden this. The same material was previously given without much ado to a [redacted] from Prague. The editor-in-chief of the East German [redacted] stated that this procedure was in line with an order given to him, according to which [redacted] publicity to the 70th birthday of [redacted] of State while commemoration days of leading [redacted] to be given far less space.

2. Dobraczynski, allegedly, stated to the East German journalist that the Poles were apparently less pliant than the Czechs in their dealings with the Soviets and that for this reason the Czechs were preferred to the Poles by [REDACTED]. If for example, the GDR had accumulated arrears in its coal [REDACTED] deliveries to Poland and Czechoslovakia, the Czechs would be back on [REDACTED] claims by the Soviets but not so the Poles. On the other hand, the Czechs had promised to furnish arms to the KVP while Warsaw had refused to help in the rearmament of East Germany. Furthermore, the difference in the situation in Poland on the one hand and Czechoslovakia on the other was also characterized by the fact that sabotage acts against the Soviets were practically unknown in Czechoslovakia.

The same material was previously given without much ado to a journalist from Prague. The editor-in-chief of the East German newspaper stated that this procedure was in line with an order given to him, according to which he had to give the widest possible publicity to the 70th birthday of Czechoslovak President Zapotocky, while commemoration days of leading Poles were to be given far less space.

Dobraczynski, allegedly, stated to the East German journalist that the Poles were apparently less pliant than the Czechs in their dealings with the Soviets and that for this reason the Czechs were preferred to the Poles by the Soviets. If for example, the GDR had accumulated arrears in its contractual deliveries to Poland and Czechoslovakia, the Czechs would be backed in their claims by the Soviets but not so the Poles.
